OUTLOOK AND STRATEGY

In view of the assessment of the U.S. economic activity, unemployment rate and inflation expectations, the FOMC announced after its recent policy meeting a raise in target range for its federal funds rate of 0.5%-0.75%. The labor market has continued to strengthen as reflected by lower unemployment rate of 4.6% in November. The total nonfarm payroll employment for the period reached 178,000 which manifest an expanding economic activity. The Consumer Price Index in October advanced to 1.6% due to higher consumer prices. While, the inflation target stood at 2.0% with current inflation rate of 1.7%. The forecasted GDP growth for the next three years is pegged at 2.0%.

The FOMC stressed that future rate hike will be data-dependent and gradual. And, there would be a periodic potential rate hike starting next year until 2019.

On the Bond market, the two-year Treasury yield rose 1.27% while the yield of the ten-year Treasury edged up 2.57%. The U.S. stocks gyrated as the market seem to be surprised and has to clench the pace of potential numerous rate hikes for the coming year/s.

On the local front, the equities market stumbled as expected after the announcement of the US Fed while local fixed income securities traded flat due to profit-taking. On the post-US fed rate hike, the peso depreciated by 0.46% and settled at Php49.960 to a dollar as of December 15, 2016. The figure of hot money outflow in November amounted to USD607.3 million.

With this, the market may continue to trade sideways due to the recent international development but may eventually represent the current level of the economy.
